Complementary therapies fact sheet

The aim of this fact sheet is to provide information about complementary therapies and how they can be accessed.

We know that some complementary therapies have helped with the after effects of meningitis* experienced by some people. Also, see our website at www.MeningitisNow.org.

What is Complementary Therapy?

A complementary therapy is one that can be used in addition to, or alongside, conventional medicine and can complement the treatment provided by doctors and other health care professionals. Complementary therapies treat the patient as a whole, rather than symptoms in isolation. They include therapeutic and aromatherapy massage, reflexology, osteopathic treatments and acupuncture.

Regulation of Complementary Therapies

Regulation of complementary therapists in the UK is by voluntary self-regulation. This means that there are no laws in place to protect the public from unqualified or incompetent therapists.

In accordance with the 2007 Government White Paper professional associations in each therapy have been working together to agree standards for each complementary therapy. The General Regulatory Council for Complementary Therapies (GRCCT) will establish a national register and validate the status of all registered therapists. Until this is established, always discuss the therapy with your doctor before beginning a course of treatment. Some complementary therapies may be available through the NHS and your doctor may be able to refer you directly.

Therapies you may find helpful

We ran a pilot project in 2013 looking at the impact of some complementary therapies following viral meningitis; see our website for more information www.meningitisnow.org. As a result we can now consider making direct referrals (dependent on criteria being met) for a course of one of the following complementary therapies:

- Acupuncture, the insertion of fine needles into the skin, stimulates a better movement of energy and circulation to help relieve pain and tension-related problems.
- Cranial osteopathy uses gentle movements to the head, neck and spine, which do not involve strong manipulation. It can help in the treatment of back, neck pain, headaches and tension-related problems.
- Reflexology uses pressure techniques on specific areas of the feet or hands to stimulate a response in corresponding areas of the body. It can help with relaxation and the relief of some symptoms.
